during the summer of 2005, the mainstream media congratulated Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on the removal of settlers from the occupied Gaza Strip. Meanwhile, the state of Israel continued its policy of unilateral, illegal land confiscation in the occupied West Bank, both to expand settlements and make room to build a wall (described as “Apartheid Wall” or “Annexation Wall” by Palestinians, “Security Fence” or “Separation Barrier” by Israelis, here referred to simply as “the wall”). In fact, Dov Weisglass, a primary architect of the Gaza plan, stated, “It supplies the amount of formaldehyde that is necessary so there will not be a political process with the Palestinians...Effectively, this whole package called the Palestinian state, with all that it entails, has been removed indefinitely from our agenda.”

Resistance by Palestinians, Israelis, and internationals is growing to Israel’s illegal military occupation, providing a hopeful look at what might happen if activists adopted a disciplined, organized nonviolent process on a national scale in the occupied territories. Given that the Palestinians already have a significant legacy of nonviolence from the first Intifada, such a movement is plausible.

The Roots of Palestinian Nonviolence

The first Intifada (or “shaking off”) was launched against the Israeli military occupation in 1987. Palestinians utilized civil disobedience and non-cooperation including tax refusal, mass demonstrations, hanging Palestinian flags, closing shops, boycotting Israeli goods, and worker strikes. In addition, Palestinians engaged in constructive programs to strengthen their communities. They formed a variety of professional and cultural associations, taught students in underground schools, planted victory gardens, planted olive trees, and organized agricultural cooperatives.

The first Intifada was “largely” free from violence. However, stone throwing was practiced frequently. (See “The Controversy of Stone Throwing.”) As the first Intifada wore on, the commitment to nonviolence seemed to weaken and some elements of clear-cut violence entered the picture, such as when Palestinians used Molotov cocktails (petrol bombs) and injured or killed Palestinian collaborators to punish and deter further betrayal of their cause. Relative to the entire scale of the nonviolent activities, Sari Nusseibeh noted in 1989, “The voice of violence on the Palestinian side is still peripheral.” That said, even ‘peripheral’ or ‘minor’ intrusions seem to compromise the ‘purity’ of one’s nonviolence and the movement’s effectiveness.

One key factor in a nonviolent movement’s success is positive media coverage and the resulting international support. Time and again, we’ve observed that if a nonviolent movement includes violence, the media will focus almost exclusively on the violence. Thus, from a strategic standpoint, disciplined movements tend to be more successful, such as the Philippines People Power movement that ousted Marcos (see p. 20) and the Eastern European revolutions that brought down Communist regimes in the Czech Republic and Poland in the late 1980s.

Although it was not as disciplined as other movements, the Intifada was quite successful in many ways. The “David versus Goliath” imagery helped to generate international sympathy for the Palestinian cause. The Palestinians established the legitimacy of their aspirations in the minds of the world.
of people around the world, built internal commitment and solidarity, created social structures, inspired left-wing Israelis to work on behalf of a resolution to the conflict, and achieved recognition of their political leaders. Unfortunately, the ensuing political process that led to the Oslo Accords in 1993 did not result in the end of Israel’s occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, but according to some, helped to entrench the conflict by deflecting international awareness away from the reality of Israel’s ongoing illegal expansion of settlements. This result did not reflect a weakness in the effectiveness of nonviolence, but in a failure of nonviolent actors to follow through when it became clear that negotiations wouldn’t succeed. This has, in fact, been a common failure in nonviolent insurrections post Gandhi.

Given that for many members of the Palestinian society, the first Intifada was an endeavor of strategic nonviolence (lack of available guns may have been the primary motivation to embrace nonviolence, not a belief in its power to reach hardened hearts), it was almost predictable that some Palestinians threw up their hands in frustration when the Oslo process failed to deliver them a state and began a struggle far more marred by the use of arms (the second Intifada, 2000-2005). Be that as it may, the results of that armed struggle and Israel’s overwhelming response have been devastating to Palestinian society, especially in the occupied territories.

Nonviolent Resistance Today: Budrus and Bil’in

Despite the more prominent violent components of the second Intifada, many Palestinians have practiced strategic nonviolence to resist military occupation and the wall in recent years. The world, moreover, has taken notice of the Palestinians’ plight. In July of 2004, the International Court of Justice ruled that the wall is illegal and a violation of Palestinian human rights. Israel claims that the wall is needed to protect its people from Palestinian suicide bombers. However, the wall is being built on the Palestinian side of the “green line,” thus annexing Palestinian land de facto.

In 2004 the residents of Budrus village successfully utilized strategic nonviolence to oppose the separation wall slated for construction on their lands. The wall not only threatened to confiscate most of the village’s agricultural lands, but also cut the villagers’ access to water resources, schools, universities, employment locations, and family. The residents of Budrus combined nonviolent political activism with a legal strategy that included daily and weekly demonstrations against the wall, and litigation against the Israeli government. The demonstrations brought together a coalition of supporters, including Israeli groups such as Ta’ayush and the Anarchists Against the Wall, international activists from the International Solidarity Movement, and members of both the Israeli Knesset and Palestinian Parliament. The political pressure from activists forced the Israeli Supreme Court to rule in favor of the Village of Budrus, and ordered the government to change the path of the wall to minimize the confiscation of Palestinian lands.

Recently, a similar coalition has converged on the village of Bil’in to oppose the land confiscation that will result from the separation wall’s intended path. The demonstrations in Bil’in, which have taken place every Friday since Spring of 2005, usually include stone... throwing. Youngsters throw stones while standing behind the peaceful demonstrators, usually of the older generation, who tend to disapprove of the stoning. (See sidebar: “The Controversy of Stone Throwing.”)

While it has yet to achieve its stated objective of rerouting the wall to save land, the Bil’in resistance movement has chalked up some very important small successes, including moments of favorable media coverage. The Bil’in villagers have chained themselves to their olive trees, formed “human barrels,” conducted prayer sessions near the route of the wall, and even held a volleyball match that deterred soldiers from entering the village.8 In September 2005, famous Dutch pianist and Holocaust survivor Jacob Allegro performed a concert at one of the demonstrations. Allegro said his mission was to oppose injustice and bring together people from all sides.9 Co-author of this story Taylor attended one of these demonstrations in July of 2005 (his account is posted at: http://calpeacepower.org/).

News reports have revealed Israeli military abuses, including undercover Israeli provocateurs who sneak over to the Palestinian side and cast the first stones (so as to provide the Israeli military a pretext to open fire). Independent media have captured Israeli soldiers severely beating and abusing activists, and then provided videotapes to refute Israeli military lies in court, including false accusations of protestor violence.10 The Bil’in resistance has made its way into the pages of Haaretz in Israel and The New York Times, providing a venue to expose the realities of the separation wall and Israeli military abuses of Palestinian human rights to the people who most need to learn about them: Israelis, US Jews, and international civil society.

Oppression is an inherently unstable force. In the face of determined nonviolent resistance, the oppressor often finds himself drawn into using ever-escalating levels of violence until inevitably something “snaps,” the resister gains in strength, and eventually the whole system falls apart. This paradox of repression played out on September 9th, 2005, when the Israeli military placed a blanket curfew on the entire village of Bil’in and attempted to block the weekly protest from occurring at all. According to Gush Shalom, the soldiers tried to arrest activists and used tear gas and rubber-coated steel bullets to intimidate Palestinians, Israelis, and internationals. Yonathan Pollack of Anarchists Against the Wall, a central organizer of the weekly Bil’in protests, had this to say: “The army tried to break the people of Bil’in and prevent by brutal force their right to protest. They especially wanted to prevent the arrival of Israeli supporters whose presence denies the army the freedom of rampage. The result was the total opposite. Today there came to Bil’in many more Israelis than on other Fridays. Not only did [the army] not prevent the march, but it got further [closer to the route of the wall] than before.”

Together, Palestinian and Israeli women unite at Bil’in to oppose the wall.

The Israeli military must have realized it made a massive strategic blunder by overreacting, as the New York Times reported that new commanders who arrived within the next month “decided it was foolish to try to shut down Bil’in or even to confront villagers and protesters near the village.”

Principled Nonviolence in the Palestinian Resistance

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

Principled Nonviolence in the Palestinian Resistance

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

Principled Nonviolence in the Palestinian Resistance

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

Principled Nonviolence in the Palestinian Resistance

As powerful as media coverage can be in influencing international opinion in favor of the Bil’in struggle, perhaps we should not overlook the individual moments of “conversion” that occur when a resistor’s courage reaches an oppressor’s heart. We have heard reports of at least two off-duty Israeli soldiers or military employees who have come over to the village to join the people’s struggle, and we suspect that as the Bil’in demonstrators grow in their dedication to nonviolence, their creative experiments will yield more goodwill and sympathy from the soldiers they face.

Building the Movement

The grassroots resistance in Budrus and Bil’in could be a small but essential component of a large, but not yet fully articulated nonviolent movement that is starting to take shape in Israel/Palestine. A number of on-the-ground organizations such as Holy Land Trust, Sabeel, and the Israeli Committee Against Home Demolitions can help provide the organizational backbone for such a movement. A conference entitled “Celebrating Nonviolent Resistance” on December 27, 2005 in Bethlehem will provide a possible nexus for organizations and activists to coordinate their efforts.

Even if nonviolence is used to change the shape of the conflict, to truly create a situation of reconciliation will require deep and systematic work at all levels of Israeli and Palestinian society. In the long run, “Nonviolence is not meant to be a tidy compartment, the habit of an occasional activist, a musing on the margins of ‘the real world.’ Nonviolence is and must become a science, a way of life, a worldview, finally, a culture.”

The Controversy of Stone Throwing

Stone throwing was one of the more controversial aspects of the first Intifada and remains a part of Palestinian resistance today. It is mainly practiced by Palestinian youths age 10-20 (called the shabab). Some Palestinians have argued that stone throwing is more an act of defiance than an intention to injure (the literal meaning of himsa, violence), saying that stones (in most cases) cannot hurt well-equipped helmeted soldiers. The shabab resort to stone throwing to protest the presence of the army on their lands. For Palestinian youngsters suffering from a deep feeling of humiliation and hopelessness, this simple yet concrete act of resistance is often a way to survive psychologically, by reclaiming a feeling of empowerment in an otherwise forlorn and depressive environment. Accordingly, different scholars note that stone throwing falls into a gray area between violence and nonviolence. Dr. Abu-Nimer refers to it as nonlethal force or unarmed resistance. Unfortunately it does have a real potential to injure. During the time we visited the holy land in the summer of 2005, one Israeli soldier reportedly lost use of an eye due to a stone. Even if such incidents are rare, the mainstream media tends to focus on them.

In Bil’in, the debate about stone throwing takes place during rallies and everyday life. After one of the weekly demonstrations in July of 2005, for example, a long discussion took place between Palestinians, Israelis, and international activists about stone throwing in particular and nonviolence in general. Some of the activists argued — correctly, in our view — that stone throwing provokes the army. Additionally, they stated that the violent conclusion of each demonstration is the only part that gets media coverage, and draws public attention away from any meaningful discussion about the issue of the wall. In conclusion, although the village council affirmed a desire to stop stone throwing, they simultaneously justified and understood the youths’ need to release their anger through throwing stones.

The history of nonviolent movements suggests that the adults, who already model more deeply committed nonviolent action, could challenge the youths to do something useful, powerful, and consistent with the resistance — something that could divert their rage and defiance into more constructive, less ambivalent channels. For instance, the youths could be asked to join the adults at the front of a march and carry out their defiance with courage and dignity — hopefully even offering a measure of respect to Israeli soldiers as they do so. Nonviolence begins with the internal conversion of a negative to a positive drive, and engaged mentorship could help youngsters to make this journey.